Each pebble that delayed thy race Ruffled your pure though hasty wave, But all again was lulled to peace, And you were silent as the grave. A little warmth can turn thee back, To flow and sparkle as of yore; To maze along the beaten track Thy former stream had traced before. The heart of man, like thy pure stream, Can feel the flowing blood made chill, Can feel it freeze with treachery's aim, And grow as hardened as thy rill. But yet, unlike thy magic spray, No heat can thaw the coldness there; No sun can warm with summer ray The heart which love has ceased to share. ON MY DEAR CLERMONT'S DEATH, MY FIFTH SON....
