Little by little, however, the fact that I was lither of limb, and in better training, began to tell. Hols was not now so much breathing heavily, as finding it difficult to breathe at all. His face, which had been flushed with passion, was now of an ashy grey, and as he rose in what proved to be the final bout, his bulky body swayed painfully, as if the very effort to stand were too much for his exhausted strength. But his grit was wonderful. Game to the last, he shaped manfully as I approached, watching my opportunity to grip him by the waist to throw him. As I stooped to effect my purpose, he struck out, dealing me a buffet which, had it taken me, as he had intended,...
