I shall merely add to these practical extracts the opinion expressed by Sir Robert Kane. Sir R. Kane. There is twice as much Flax imported into Great Britain from foreign parts as there is grown in this country, and yet there is no actual impediment to its cultivation, for it appears to be uniformly a remunerating crop where attended with ordinary care, and may, by the proper application of scientific principles to its culture, be rendered one of the least expensive or exhausting crops that the agriculturist can have to do with. And at another page, f he observes: Flax returns all The agriculturist should steadily bear in it takes away. mind tht the fifare which he tQ fche pJax spinner has taken nothing from the soil. All that the crop took out of the soil he has still in the steep water, and in the chaff of the scutched Flax; and if after suitable decomposition these be returned to the land, the fertility of the latter will be restored, and thus materials at present utterly neglected, and even a source of inconvenience, may be converted into most valuable manures. Industrial Resources, p. 317. f lb-312 50. But not only is Flax not an exhaustive...
